CLINICAL FOCUS

Lymphedema is a persistent swelling, most often of an arm or a leg, that develops when lymphatic fluid does not drain normally. It may be present from birth or develop later in life, and it can appear after surgery, radiation or infection that affects the lymphatic vessels or lymph nodes.

Faika Nur Erkol's work concentrates on the physiotherapy-based treatment of lymphedema. The approach in an individual case depends on a clinical assessment of the affected area, the stage and cause of the swelling, the patient's general health and any previous treatment. Progress is reviewed over the course of care, and patients are usually shown how to continue relevant measures between sessions.
